SHERIFF OF TOMBSTONE

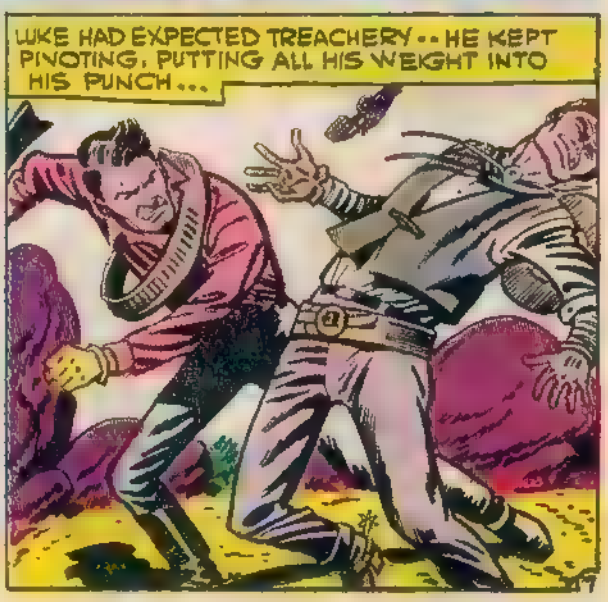
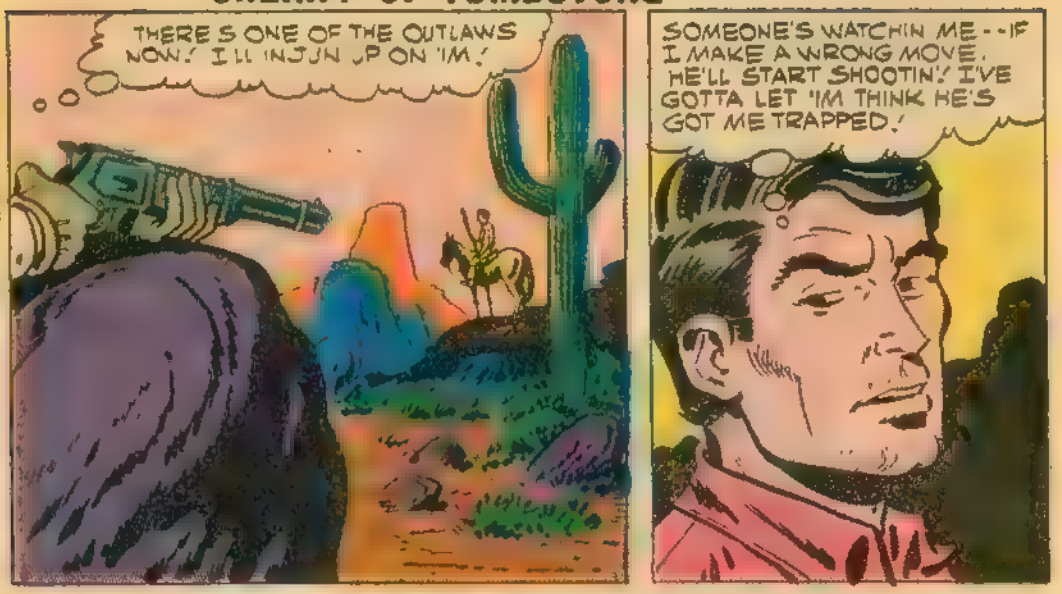
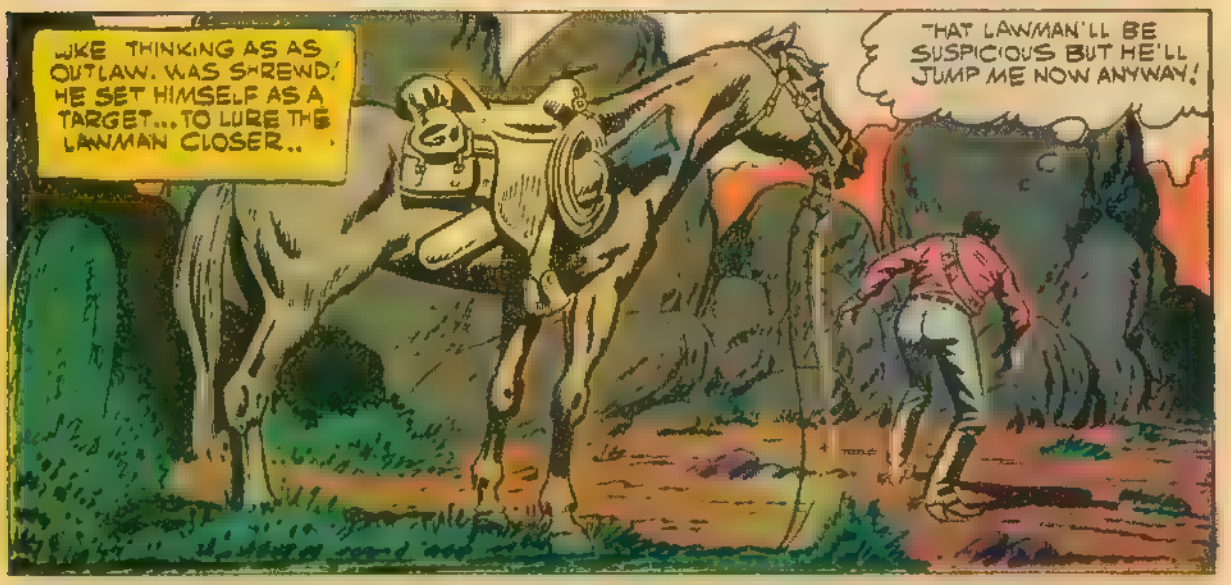
THE OWLHOOTERS GAVE HIM A SHIRT -- THEY LOANED HIM A RIFLE! THEY RODE DOUBLE, GIVING "GRINGO EVANS" THE OTHER HORSE TO RIDE TO THE OUTLAW CAMP! HE MET A DOZEN OTHER OWLHOOTERS THERE...
BOYS, MEET GRINGO EVANS -- HE'S THROWIN' IN WITH US!
EVANS? YOU ARE GRINGO EVANS?



THEY ALL SAW IT.. HE'D PROVEN HIMSELF! LUKE STILL THINKING HE WAS EVANS, THE OUTLAW RODE ALONE MOST OF THE TIME...



THERE'S ONE OF THE OUTLAWS NOW! I'LL INJUN UP ON 'IM!
SOMEONE'S WATCHIN' ME--IF I MAKE A WRONG MOVE, HE'LL START SHOOTIN'! I'VE GOTTA LET 'IM THINK HE'S GOT ME TRAPPED!



LUKE THINKING AS AS OUTLAW. WAS SHREWD! HE SET HIMSELF AS A TARGET... TO LURE THE LAWMAN CLOSER..

HOLD-UP!

THERE was a time in the Black Hills, when tempted by the heavy shipments of gold dust and bullion via the stage lines, highway robberies by armed men were frequent. Road agents, as they were called, stopped nearly every unguarded coach which passed between Cheyenne and Deadwood. And it became necessary to have every treasure coach strongly guarded. The procedure was to use eight armed men to guard a coach, besides two others who rode a distance ahead and two behind.

On June 26th, 1878, one of the treasure coaches was attacked near the Cheyenne River. After an exchange of a few shots, which wounded the driver, the highwaymen won a complete victory over the guards. The passengers were all ordered out and placed in a line alongside the road. They were compelled to hold up their hands, with the muzzles of cocked revolvers pointed at their faces while one of the robbers searched their pockets and baggage for valuables. Next came the treasure box. Failing to unlock it, the robbers tried to open it with hatchets. The next result was only to blunt the edges of the hatchets.One of the robbers suggested using gunpowder. The highway men thus succeeded, and after emptying the box of its gold, permitted the coach to pass on its way.

On July 1st, 1878, while the Cheyenne coach was passing near the same place in the night time, two men suddenly appeared at the side of the coach and demanded it to halt. The passengers were ordered to alight and all obeyed. After reaching the ground the men stood in line, with one road agent behind as a guard, with a gun and two revolvers. The other robber began at the opposite end of the line, from which a man named Flynn stood, and commenced going through the passengers. When he had reached the man standing second from him, Flynn whispered to his nearest comrade to look after the unarmed robber and he would attend to the guard behind them. Flynn then drew a pistol and the robber fired at him, wounding him in the face. Not daunted by his injury, the brave passenger ran around the coach and hid in the bush. The two exchanged shots. Taking advantage of the commotion, the driver whipped up and drove on. He later returned to pick up Flynn and another passenger. The robbers escaped but without stealing anything from the passengers or the coach.

It seemed as though an epidemic of hold-ups was taking place. On the 25th of the same month, before daybreak, the stage was again stopped near Hat Creek by six armed men, who were on foot and masked. Finding but one passenger on board and learning he was a preacher, the robbers left him alone unmolested. They turned their attention to the mail sacks which they cut open and robbed of registered letters and other valuable matters. They broke open the treasure boxes, expecting to find gold. But the boxes were empty. When finished with their work, the robbers ordered the driver to go on.

About the 13th of September of the same year, near the same place, the coach was fired into and a man with a mask, from a distance, ordered the driver to have the passengers get out. There were but two, a lady and a gentleman, who very willingly complied with the request. The man was ordered to hold up his hands, and his arms were securely tied behind him with a buckskin string. The captain of the gang then told him he had taken a fancy to his ulster overcoat and wanted it. Off came the strings, and off came the overcoat. The passenger's pockets were next searched though he assured the robber it was a foregone conclusion he was broke. Five dollars were, however, obtained. The lady was asked to produce her cash and all she had was one dollar and a quarter. Business certainly was bad on that hold up. The ghostly light of the lamp of the south bound coach would be seen and that was the target of the robbers. From the guard they got a shot gun, watch and chain, two pistols, one overcoat and fifteen dollars in cash. Another passenger only had ten dollars. The robbers were mad. They wanted his boots, and they asked him the size. The passenger sat down on the grass, and held his foot aloft, while the robber leader placed his foot against the boot. There was a difference of several sizes so the lucky passenger at least kept his boots. From a woman passenger of the south bound coach they took several of her rings, including the wedding band. Upon her bended knees she pleaded for the return of the wedding ring but the robber leader told her he could use it. As for the treasure boxes, when opened they were found to contain only envelopes with nothing in them. The robbers tied up everyone but one of the passengers. Then they left and the untied passenger released the rest of the victims. Several of the party congratulated themselves that a more thorough search was not made. One had ten dollars under the lining of his hat. Another had a substantial roll of bills concealed in his coat sleeve. And the lady who lost only a dollar and a quarter had one hundred and ninety dollars concealed within her stockings.

Two days later the same group of road agents again attacked and robbed two coaches in the same locality. The north bound coach left Hat Creek at about nine o'clock. Two hours later, while on the middle of a short steep hill, came the cry, "Halt!" Below the coach and lying on their faces were four men, each pointing a business looking rifle. Their leader asked the driver, "How many passengers have you?" Receiving the answer, "Two, a lady and a gentleman," they were told to get out and hold their hands up. The man was asked how much money he had "Thirty dollars," was the reply. The highway man said he would take one half, for they were after the treasure. They asked for some food and the driver gave them a box of fruit. The hold up men ate it, and offered some to the passengers. They took the mail sacks, cut them open, and sorted out the valuables on the ground. The driver was then told to go ahead with his coach. Two hours later he met the south bound coach and informed them what had happened. The guards decided to lay a trap for the robbers. They followed the coach two hundred yards behind on horseback. However there were only two guards and when the coach was stopped they were ready for action. For half an hour firing continued between the guards and the robbers. One robber was killed, two badly wounded, and one was untouched.

Meanwhile a bit of common sense was called into action to halt the road agents. First it was decided to make the business unprofitable. Passengers were informed to carry only a minimum of cash with them. Thus on one hold up, the robbers got only fourteen dollars from six passengers. Asked why they had such little cash with them, one passenger replied, "That none but fools would carry money knowing they were sure to lose it." Second, it was decided to make the life of a road agent risky. The guards became bolder and killed several of the highwaymen. The sheriffs and their posse went into action and holding up the coaches was no longer a paying business.
